Mediator: Thank you both for meeting. Our goal today isn't to assign blame but to find a Win-Win solution regarding the roadshow logistics. We want to be hard on the problem, but soft on each other.

AAA: John, I'll start. I realize that changing the equipment list without consulting you caused the program to lose the "vibrancy" you planned, and I apologize for that. I used an "I" statement to reflect on how my unilateral decision affected the team.

John: I appreciate that, AAA. It was frustrating because I had a specific vision for the event's impact on our clients.

Mediator: It's clear you both have common ground: you both want the project to succeed for the benefit of our clients. Let's focus on that shared need rather than our individual positions.

AAA: I agree. I've been thinking of a way to fix the communication gap. What if we create a "Logistics and Budget Sync"?. I can identify all potential cost-saving opportunities, but I will present them to you for approval before I contact any vendors.

John: That sounds like a fair way to move forward. It allows me to maintain the project vision while benefiting from your talent for cost-cutting.

Mediator: Excellent. We've moved from a conflict of "who is in charge" to a collaborative process. This new protocol ensures AAA's good intentions are channeled constructively without disrupting the program.

AAA: I'm glad we worked this out. I'm committed to active participation in our team meetings from now on to ensure we stay aligned.

Mediator: Great work. This agreement is now something you both own, which is the key to a successful mediation.
